

JOHN LEVERETT MOORE

1849 - 1926

In the death of Professor Emeritus John Leverett Moore, the faculty of Vassar College has lost a loyal and distinguished colleague. Throughout his thirty-two years of work here, Mr. Moore stood conspicuously for three things: sympathetic understanding of the undergraduate's point of view, sincere and helpful cooperation with his co-workers and unswerving fealty to his own high ideals of scholarship. His unostentatious labor is recorded in the minutes of committees on which he served and in the content of the classical library and the museum which he established.

His more subtle and undefinable contribution to the annals of Vassar is the prestige gained from having associated with the college during so long a period a professor eminent and respected in American circles of classical scholars. His work lives on through the gratitude of the students he encouraged the friendship of his friends, and the devotion of his department.
